Apache camel jms topic example report template pdf download

Well when an order is received from the JMS queue the message is routed like pipes and filters: 1. The TemplatedRouteBuilder also allows to bind local beans (which allows to specify those beans) when creating routes from existing templates. joor Using joor (Java code which are runtime compiled) to create the bean. Suppose the route template below is defined in XML: The template has no bean bindings for # {{myClient}} which would be required for creating the template. When an order is received we need to process it in several steps: validate register send confirm email This can be created in a route like this: In the route above we specify pipeline but it can be omitted as its default, so you can write the route as: This is commonly used not to state the pipeline. We need the message to flow to the validateOrder, then to the registerOrder, then the sendConfirmEmail so adding the pipeline, provides this facility. The type of the bean can be specified (S3Client.class) however it is optional (can be used if you need to let beans be discovered by type and not by name). For example suppose there is a class named com.foo.MyAwsHelper that has a method called createS3Client then you can call this method from the route template in XML DSL: com.foo.MyAwsHelper?method=createS3Client The method signature of createS3Client must then have 1 parameter for the RouteTemplateContext as shown: public static S3Client createS3Client(RouteTemplateContext rtc) { return S3Client.builder().region(rtc.getProperty("region", Region.class)).build(); } If you are using pure Java code (both template and creating local bean), then you can create the local bean using Java lambda style as previously documented. So suppose we have a class as follows public class MyBar { private String name; private String address; // getter/setter omitted public String location() { return "The bar " + name + " is located at " + address; } } Then we can use the MyBar class as a local bean in a route template as follows: routeTemplate("barTemplate").templateParameter("bar").templateParameter("street").templateBean("myBar").typeClass("com.foo.MyBar").property("name", "{{bar}}").property("address", "{{street}}").end().from("direct:going-out").to("bean:{{myBar}}") With Java DSL you can also refer to the bean class using type safe way: .templateBean("myBar").typeClass(MyBar.class).property("name", "{{bar}}").property("address", "{{street}}").end()
